Making Administrative Records Key to Operational Agility at the U.S. Census Bureau

Presider: Victoria Velkoff, American Community Survey Office, U.S. Census Bureau

The changing landscape of America's communities yields new and complex challenges for survey and census takers. This session details the impetus behind recent U.S. Census Bureau research initiatives to evaluate the use of administrative records to replace or supplement content on our surveys and the census. The Census Bureau has made significant progress exploring the use of administrative records in household surveys and the census to meet these challenges and continue to meet the data needs of an increasingly complex nation. Incorporating administrative records into our data gathering and analysis efforts will have a palpable impact on respondents by reducing the amount of information we request from them. Administrative records may also increase data reliability and provide cost-savings by reducing the need for follow up visits. While there is great potential for the role of administrative records in the future of data collection and processing, there are also great challenges to using these data (e.g., issues with matching rates, geographic coverage, leveraging data designed for different uses). We examine these obstacles and the Census Bureau's efforts to overcome them. To conclude, we discuss public perceptions and attitudes about linking administrative sources with survey and census data.

Implications of Adolescent Sexual Behavior for Adult Sexual Health: Lessons from the Add Health Study

Carolyn Tucker Halpern
SDA Plenary Speaker 2018

Carolyn T. Halpern, PhD, is Professor and Chair, Department of Maternal and Child Health in the Gillings School of Global Public Health at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Dr. Halpern is a developmental psychologist; her research aims to improve understanding of healthy sexual development and the implications of adolescent experiences for developmental and demographic processes into adulthood. She is Deputy Director/co-investigator of the Waves IV and V National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent to Adult Health (Add Health) program projects, and co-PI of a newly launched NICHD/NIMHD-funded study, "Sexual Orientation/Gender Identity, Socioeconomic Status, and Health across the Life Course," that will collect new developmental data collected from sexual and gender minorities in the Add Health cohort. Before her work on Add Health, Dr. Halpern directed two US-based longitudinal studies examining pubertal changes and their implications for adolescent sexual and psychosocial development, as well as a global longitudinal data collection project assessing the potential of the Web for improving adolescents' knowledge about sexual and reproductive health. She is the author/co-author of 13 book chapters and 140 peer-reviewed journal articles on these topics. Dr. Halpern greatly enjoys working with younger scholars, and has received university-wide and national awards for graduate mentoring and academic leadership.

Session 3A, 1:30 – 2:40 pm Thursday, October 11, Junior Ballroom A2

Partnership and Communication Efforts for the 2020 Census

Presider: Linda A. Jacobsen, PRB

The Integrated Partnership and Communications operation conveys the importance of participating in the 2020 Census to the entire population of the 50 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and the Island Areas by engaging and motivating people to self-respond, preferably via the internet, and raising and keeping awareness high throughout the entire 2020 Census. A variety of tactics are used to reach these goals such as paid advertising, public relations, the Statistics in Schools program, social media and other digital efforts. The integrated partnership efforts use strategic national and local partnerships to increase public trust, awareness, and support of the U.S. Census Bureau's mission to accurately measure the nation's population and economy. Enrolling community partners to increase decennial participation of those who are less likely to respond or are often missed helps us to educate people about the 2020 Census and foster cooperation with enumerators, encourage community partners to motivate people to self-respond, and engage grass roots organizations to reach out to hard-to-count groups and those who are not motivated to respond to the national campaign. A more in-depth look at these efforts is provided in this session, where Census Bureau staff will be joined by external stakeholders involved in these efforts.

Enhancing Respondent Mail Materials for the American Community Survey

President: Jennifer M. Ortman, American Community Survey Office, U.S. Census Bureau

The U.S. Census Bureau asks respondents to complete the American Community Survey (ACS) through a series of mailings. The mail materials are critical in encouraging their response. Their design and the messages they contain not only convey key information about participation in the survey, but also sets the tone for the respondent's interaction with the Census Bureau. To increase self-response and reduce concerns with the mandatory nature of participation, which has been a topic of concern for many respondents, the Census Bureau has been working to enhance the ACS respondent mail materials. This session includes presentations on several research projects carried out with the objective of improving the mail materials, including tests of revised mail materials, establishment of a strategic framework to guide evaluation and future development of mail materials, and inclusions of a data slide (i.e., data tool) in the mailings to engage respondents and encourage self-response.

Innovations in Biosocial Research and Training

President: Regina Bures, NIH/NICHD

The poor overall health status of the U.S. population in comparison with our high-income peers and the staggering gaps in key measures of health and well-being by socioeconomic status and race/ethnicity across the life course highlight the urgency with which we must address the factors and mechanisms that lead to poor health outcomes. At the same time, it has become ever more apparent that the scientific paradigms and research approaches of yesterday have not effectively addressed the complex constellation of factors that fundamentally influence U.S. health and well-being from birth through adulthood. For these reasons, the National Institutes of Health has called for novel integrative research, from cells to society, to better address the web of factors that cause persistent health inequalities and result in relatively poor overall levels of health in U.S. society. Over the last two decades, several innovative projects in the population sciences, spearheaded by the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent to Adult Health (Add Health), have begun to fill this research need. Nonetheless, there are still major gaps in interdisciplinary research efforts and training programs in U.S. universities that truly bridge the social and biological sciences and produce highly trained interdisciplinary scholars who conduct integrative work that will address some of the country's most pressing health problems.

This panel provides an overview of cutting-edge biosocial research and training that is unfolding at the Carolina Population Center (CPC). Panelist Robert Hummer will first describe what "biosocial" research is, why it is important and needed, and what the current state is of integration of social and biological approaches in the study of population health. He will also describe the Carolina Population Center's newly NICHD-funded Biosocial Training Program, which aims to help fill that interdisciplinary training gap. Two of the new CPC predoctoral trainees, Andi Goodwin and Rae Anne Martinez, will then describe their research and training programs and the reasons why the biosocial training program was a good fit for their career goals. They will also provide brief summaries of their experiences in the program to date and discuss how such involvement will have an impact on the kinds of research questions they might ask in the future and the types of data they may use to answer those questions. Finally, new CPC postdoctoral trainee Grace Noppert will describe her unfolding integrative research career and provide an example of the biosocial research questions she is asking, the data sets she is using, and some of the recent and important findings she is uncovering.

Challenges for the Federal Statistical System in the 21st Century

John H. Thompson
SDA Plenary Speaker 2018

John H. Thompson served as the Executive Director of the Council of Professional Associations on Federal Statistics (COPAFS) from July 2017 through August 2018. COPAFS represents Associations and Organizations that rely on the quality and accessibility of statistics that can only be effectively collected by the federal government.

Thompson served as the 24th Director of the U.S. Census Bureau from August 2013 through June 2017. As Director, Thompson oversaw preparations for the 2020 Census and presided over more than 100 other censuses and surveys, which measure America's people, places and economy and provide the basis for crucial economic indicators.

A statistician and executive, Thompson had been President and CEO of NORC at the University of Chicago from 2008 through July 2013, when he left NORC for the Census Bureau. He served as the independent research organization's Executive Vice President from 2002 to 2008.

Thompson had a distinguished career at the Census Bureau from 1975 to 2002 before joining NORC. Most notably, as an Associate Director, he was the senior career executive responsible for all aspects of the 2000 Census.

A longtime leader in the social science research community, Thompson is an elected fellow of the American Statistical Association and past chair of the association's Social Statistics Section and Committee on Fellows. He served as a member of the Committee on National Statistics at the National Academy of Sciences. He participated as a member of the CNSTAT panel on the design of the 2010 Census Program of Evaluations and Experiments and the panel to review the 2010 Census.

He holds bachelor's and master's degrees in mathematics from Virginia Tech.
